Patient Information Leaflet

Introduction

The aim of this leaflet is to provide information on what you should be looking for when purchasing footwear.

Examples of good footwear

Some examples of good footwear are shown in figure 1:

Top tip

It is a good idea to wear either shoes or house shoes when inside as these give more support than traditional slippers.

What are the features of a good shoe?

Heel counter

This is the reinforcement around the heel of a shoe, it helps to stabilise the foot. The heel counter should be firm.

If you can push the heel counter down with very little effort, this is not suitable.

Insoles

Some footwear will come with removable insoles. These allow for extra depth in the shoe and can be adapted if your foot swells.

Fastenings

If you are able to reach your feet, the shoes should have a fastening. Laces, touch and close (like Velcro®) or buckles all help to hold the shoe securely on your foot.

If you are unable to reach your feet to fasten shoes, slip on shoes should come as high up the foot as possible, to contain the majority of your foot.

Heel height

The heel of the shoe should be as broad as the shoe itself and under four centimetres (one and a half inches) high.

Pitch

The heel should be one and a half to two centimetres (three quarters of an inch) thicker than the sole under the ball of the foot. This allows the foot and ankle to function with less strain.

Sole

The sole should provide cushioning and have enough grip to prevent slipping.

If the shoe can be easily bent in half, this is not a sufficient sole.

Toe box

The toe box should be wide enough not to squash the toes, and deep enough to allow your toes to wriggle in the shoe.

Where can I buy 'good' footwear?

Here is a list of manufacturers of footwear who tend to offer styles that meet the criteria of a good shoe.

Please note this is not a complete list, and an expensive shoe is not necessarily a good shoe. You can buy your footwear from anywhere as long as you try to follow the advice in this leaflet. Here are some suppliers who have suitable footwear:
